For computers that are running Windows Vista Business, Windows Vista Ultimate, or Windows Vista Enterprise, Windows 7 Home Basic, Windows 7 Home Premium, or Windows 7 Professional, language packs are not available. If you encounter issues related to language packs, you may be required to do one of the following: Update the language pack that is on your system, or Update the language pack that is on the system of the person who is trying to use your computer, or Update the language pack that is on the system of the person who is trying to use your computer. Windows XP Language Packs are only available for computers that are running Windows XP Professional, Windows XP Home Edition, or Windows XP Home. They are not available for Windows XP Home Edition SP1. When a language pack is updated, a message will appear informing you that the new language pack is available. You are responsible for updating your system when the language pack is available. Your system will allow you to un-install the previous language pack. After the previous language pack is uninstalled, the new language pack can be installed. When a language pack is updated, the language pack will be installed for the current user. If you are a domain administrator, the domain administrator will be notified that the language pack has been updated, and they will be able to install the new language pack. If your system prompts you to restart your computer, select "Yes," because language packs do not automatically update after your computer has restarted. The following sections provide additional information about language packs. About Language Packs The language pack installation process allows the update of language packs on Windows XP systems, Windows Vista systems, and Windows 7 systems.
